

Currently, software development companies search for greater capability to adapt to technological changes, process productivity and quality of the final product. Model driven development approaches are the most promising initiatives to reach these goals. However, these approaches still lack from adequate mechanisms to fully derive implementation from models described at a high level of abstraction. This paper shows an action specification language based on controlled natural language to complement these models, that is precise and processable, besides being at a high level of abstraction.