

The complexity and fast growth of the Internet gave rise to a number of models and proposals for the communication amongst applications in a distributed computing environment. The Web Service technology stands as an attracting alternative. It offers a low coupling level between agents and is based on XML, http and other well established standards for the Internet. This tutorial analyses the suitability and facilities offered by the programming language Java in the development of Web Services.